Summary	Socrates heads to Agathon's banquet on the occasion of the poet's victory in the city's competition. The guests eagerly await his arrival and begin a discussion on Eros, the god of Love. The artist Phaedrus calls him the oldest of the gods and notes that he inspires lovers to show courage, for example, on the battlefield, since nothing could shame more than to be seen as a coward in the eyes of a beloved one. The writer Pausanias specifies that there are two Erotes and two Aphrodites, which means that there are two kinds of love: terrestrial (sensual) and heavenly. Then, in contrast to Plato's dialogue, Agathon speaks, he describes this god as the most tender, awakening feelings in the hearts of mortals and gods alike and transforming a lover into a poet. After the applause, Eryximachus, the doctor, takes the floor, pointing out that love is a universal law and that Eros himself combines opposite characteristics – discord and harmony, need and prosperity. Comediographer Aristophanes recounts the Myth of the Androgynous, whereby love is understood to be the search for one's missing half and the happy reunion of these two pieces. After a short discussion, Socrates begins his speech, retelling the teaching of the priestess Diotima about the Ladder of Love, which is also a teaching about Beauty. Then, in a moment of common tension, Alcibiades appears, praising the philosopher so much that he seems akin to the god Eros. The feast continues, and before going home, Socrates confesses that the object of his love, which gives meaning to life, is no other than philosophy. A new day begins.

Analysis

Based on a presentation by Angelina Gerus "Socrates in Love": How to Introduce Plato to the Youngest on the conference "Our Mythical History: Children's and Young Adults' Culture in Response to the Heritage of Ancient Greece and Rome" (May 22-26, 2019; Warsaw, Poland). Summary in the conference booklet is available online at omc.obta.al.uw.edu.pl (Accessed: November 5, 2021).

Socrate est amoureux (Eng. Socrates in Love) by Salim Mokkadem is an adaptation of Plato's Symposium entertainingly recounted for young readers. It may serve as a primer engaging a child into philosophy and Platonic theory of Forms in particular. Moreover, regarding philosophy, the story brings to light the themes of love and sexuality, truth and wisdom, which are of great importance to young audiences.

The title shifts the focus from the banquet and its participants to Socrates and his mysterious object of love. Therefore, the philosopher's superiority over the others is emphasised clearly: he is expected to be the main character, whose figure is crucial for the storyline, and he is supposed to guide readers through the text.

Although the device enriches the story with explanations and comments, the omniscient narrator is not involved in the plot. Moreover, Plato's prologue is eliminated so that the text is no longer the story of Aristodemus being recounted by Apollodorus to his friend Glaucon. At the same time, all the discourses of Plato's Symposium (those of Phaedrus, Pausanias, Agathon, Eryximachus, Aristophanes, Socrates and Alcibiades) are present in Mokaddem's book, however, slightly reordered. Thereby it deprives itself of the philosophical significance of the original form (since each speech stands as a link in a chain of the concept of love, from its lowest to its highest level). As a result, such a series of orations, typical for the symposium as a prose genre in classical literature, is transformed into a short story with many dialogues.

The figure of Socrates, who is a protagonist of the book, dominates both verbal and visual narration (as the book is generous with illustrations). The story begins straight from the moment when the philosopher, "shaved, perfumed and wearing fancy slippers" (p. 7), heads to the banquet held by Agathon. This character also enables a chiasmic compositional structure: as the text starts with his arrival, it ends when he's gone in the morning. Socrates is represented as a vivid, historical person more than it was in Plato's texts. This aspect is re-enforced not only by indicating the years of birth and death of the thinker placed on the front flip of the jacket and followed by a short anecdote by Diogenes Laertius (cf. D. L. II.5.36-37), but also by a remark of Aristophanes in the text itself. Interrupting Socrates' speech to compare his parents to the ones of Eros, the comic playwright stresses their resemblance, in this manner providing readers with some additional information from the philosopher's bio. In the children's book, biographical elements aim to show Socrates in a more realistic way that should bring him closer to the young reader.

Like in the Greek text, Socrates turns to be an intermediary for Plato's ideas, albeit to a lesser extent than in the dialogue. In simple terms, the famous Ladder of Love, referring to the mantineian prophetess Diotima, is set out explicitly: as a gradual progression up the ladder from love to the body, through love to all the beautiful bodies, through love to the soul, finally through love to Beauty. Thus, the speech of Socrates can also be considered an argument in favor of the doctrine of Forms. Although in this very book there is no purpose in introducing Plato's ontology to children in its entirety (since, for example, the Allegory of the Cave or the theory of soul are represented in another publication within "Les Petits Platons" series), it makes readers gain the knowledge and experience from interaction with the text and absorb the codes that will facilitate one's further access to Plato's doctrine and philosophy as a whole.

Besides being a stepping-stone to Plato's philosophy, the short story stands as a tribute to Socrates. The character is thoughtful, virtuous, ironic, more attractive and interesting than others; as Roland Barthes notes in "A Lover's Discourse", Socrates is atopos - atypical and unclassifiable in the eyes of a subject in love. Everybody, including a reader, eagerly looks forward to his arrival at Agathon's, to his speech as a culmination point. In the book, Socartes behaves in an emotive way: he comments on the discourses, smiles, laughs, raises his eyes to the heavens, shakes his head or expresses his delight listening to the interlocutors, which push the reader to reflection.

Mokaddem's book demonstrates distinctly and precisely both the ideas of Plato and the Socratic method, maieutics. The story itself ends on a truly Socratic note: "Life without love turns into suffering. Life without philosophy is lacking in the very substance. Yes, I'm in love. I love philosophy, as philosophy is the love to the genuine life" (p. 61). The Socrates's figure continues its guidance further through other books of the series issued by "Les Petits Platons" publishing house, in the books La Mort du divin Socrate (The Death of Socrates, 2010) by Jean Paul Mongin, Socrate sort de l'Ombre (Socrates comes out of the Shadows, 2012) and Socrate Président ! (Socrates for President!, 2017) by Yan Marchand.
