Charles Dannelly Shaw , 1834 - 1909 (Author)

Charles Dannelly Shaw was an American author of biography and history about whom little can be found in the present day. He published Stories of the Ancient Greeks in 1903. The same author may be behind the texts 'An oration delivered at the Wigwam, Paterson, N.J., on July 4th, 1865' and 'The public services in memory of William McKinley: President of the United States' in 1901' and 'Manual, Second Presbyterian Church, 1840-1880, Paterson, N.J.' He seems also to have prepared the Henrietta Jane Bedford Papers for the Historical Society of Delaware in 1871.

Analysis

In the preface, Shaw tells us he writes this book because "He remembers what joy it was to him to read about the Greek gods .... He knows that life has been brighter to him .... because of the knowledge thus gained and the fancies thus kindled. It is his hope to brighten ... other young lives" with the same stories (preface). Greek myth is thus shown to be a nostalgic enjoyment for Shaw, and one which he wants to impart to other childhoods as it was imparted to his own. Shaw also claims that Greek myths are "the heritage of the race"; presumably this is an attempt to claim myth as the intellectual property of predominantly white and European societies (preface).

In the introduction, Shaw describes the history of the ancient Greeks in broadly neutral terms. This is in contrast to the Victorian myth anthologies of, for example, Nathaniel Hawthorne *A Wonder-Book for Girls and Boys* (1851) and *Tanglewood Tales for Girls and Boys* (1853), Emma Firth *Stories of Old Greece* (1894) and Mary Helen Beckwith *In Mythland* (1896), which depict ancient Greece as a pure childhood of the world where people are innocent, curious and sweet. Presumably, the different approach taken by Shaw reflects the shift towards realism and perceived accuracy of the twentieth century.

Shaw claims as his main sources Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon and Plutarch. In reality, however, the mythology section of his anthology, like most children's anthologies, appears to draw primarily on Ovid, Apollodorus and the Athenian tragedians. The fact Shaw wishes his anthology to be seen as drawing primarily on the ancient historians, however, may reflect a view of history as a 'higher' form of literature than mythography, as well as perhaps a desire to introduce children early to the names of the ancient historians in particular.

Finally, Shaw tells us his book is intended both as "an introduction to further study for those who have the opportunity" and for those "who do not pursue their studies beyond the grammar grade." (Introduction.) The purpose of this wider audience, as well as being a wider pool of buyers, is presumably because, as Shaw claims, "nobody can claim to be well-educated who does not know" Greek myth. (Introduction.) Myths are thus presented as the bedrock of a proper education.

The Pandora myth is altered from its Hesiodic version to reflect nineteenth and early twentieth century ideals of companionate marriage and the nuclear family. Pandora is created because man is lonely. Athene gives her the gift of wisdom, which in this story means "This woman shall be wise to spin, to weave, to do all manner of household work, and to train up children in goodness." (Chapter Three.) Pandora's function as a warm and loving teacher, in which her own intellect primarily exists to help shape that of her future children, is thus particularly emphasised. Meanwhile, Apollo gives her the power of music, which means "She shall be able to sing sweet songs of love and home and hope and heaven .... To cheer man when he is tired, and to comfort him when he is sad." Thus gifts not obviously related to woman's role in the family are still made to be about that, with women's music primarily serving the role of comforting sad men. (Chapter Three.) The other gods, meanwhile, state in their gift speeches about Pandora that woman is "not a fighter", "more patient and steadfast" than man, and possessed of 'a warm and tender heart'. (Chapter Three.) Overall, therefore, Shaw retains the idea in Hesiod of Pandora as symbol for all that is (perceived to be) different between men and women, but he alters Hesiod's more overtly hostile misogyny into the Victorian domesticity ideal of woman as in some ways morally superior to man but naturally oriented towards family and nurture.

In a similar vein, Poseidon specifically begins to think of finding a wife after Hephaestus builds him a house, because "He did not like to live there alone" (Chapter Seven). A connection is therefore drawn between wives, home and companionship. Poseidon and Amphitrite's courtship also proceeds along dating customs of the time, with the man "calling on" the whole family of the woman he is interested in to get to know her better.

In general, this anthology sticks closely to ancient (mostly Ovidian) literary accounts with little elaboration or altering of details. However, as is common in children's literature, it does sometimes change stories to be less violent, dark or upsetting, as when Apollo becomes a slave not in punishment for slaying Zeus' Cyclopes workers as in ancient versions, but because he "shot his arrows at them and greatly annoyed them." (Chapter Twenty-Four.) Apollo also accepts his punishment for this fairly graciously, and it is almost implied to be a process of agreement between Zeus and himself, with Apollo stating he "should like to be a shepherd" for his friend Admetus during this year of punishment. (Chapter Twenty-Four.)
