Additional information

Summary

The story opens with a griot's warning that white folks will invade Africa, capture blacks, and sell them as goods. He recounts the story of Dinga, a well-respected blacksmith who, after losing his beloved wife, decides to raise his newborn baby boy all by himself. Although elderly women in the village advise him to remarry or give out his son as requires their culture and tradition, Dinga rather dedicates his son to the Mother Elements (the goddess of the earth, the goddess of the wind, the goddess of fire and the goddess of water) asking them to help him raise him. He names the baby Musafa which means only the universe is greater (p. 12). Musafa grows up and becomes an interesting boy who learns life-sustaining values like courage, family bonds and love from daily discussions with the mother elements. During that period, griots, through their songs and drums, spread rumors of faraway inter-tribal wars and divisions caused by the whites who gradually invade Africa. Soon after, Musafa becomes his father's apprentice as required by the family tradition, but he was not fully skilled like his father. Musafa suddenly disappears (he is captured by the white slave dealers), leaving Dinga devastated. He is bound by chains alongside other villagers for the horrible transatlantic journey.

The Mother Elements try everything possible to save their beloved son Musafa. Mother Earth rages through earthquakes but the slave dealers are able to outsmart her. Mother Fire burns up the Savannah through wild flames but when she is about to snatch Musafa from their chains, they successfully get into the Atlantic Ocean. She is however comforted by Musafa's bravery in facing the unknown. Mother Water rages through storms, floods and thunder to no avail. The journey to the Western world is perilous and dreadful as many fall sick, die and their bodies are thrown into the ocean. Yet Musafa is courageous enough to preach messages of hope and perseverance to the other captives. He tells them: "stop crying. Be stubborn. Refuse to die! Live!" (p. 30). After crossing the middle passage, they are sold out in sugar plantations in Jamaica, Cuba, and Carolina. Dinga mourns his son for three years and becomes miserable. Mother Wind finally gathers powers from the other mother elements and is transported to the Caribbean in the form of a Hurricane in search of Musafa. She sees Africa's children taken from the Ibo, Yoruba, Soninke, Wolof, Akan, Mandingo etc. tribes who now work in the plantations and build the huge houses for the white man. She finds the boy in South Carolina. He is now a young man who has been renamed by his white master as Moses. Mother Wind is very happy because Musafa and the other African children have not forgotten their origins and cultural identities. They still tell stories about Anansi and Rabbit. He has become a skilled and renowned blacksmith who proudly tells the white he learnt this art from his father Dinga and that he is the eighth generation of blacksmiths in his clan. Mother Wind cannot communicate with him in this strange land, but she caresses his forehead, and he closes his eyes as if responding to the greeting. Mother Earth brings home news about Musafa and Dinga rejoices. The story ends with the conviction that those who were taken, stolen from Africa, were never forgotten.

Analysis

The transatlantic slave trade marked a significant turn in the history of Africa. Africans were captured and transported to the new world to work on the sugar plantations as slaves. This history was inevitable as seen in the Mother Elements' failure to rescue Musafa from the grip of the slave traders. Nonetheless, they succeed in creating a connection between Musafa and his ancestry through the lessons of courage, family ties and love they taught him while he was still at home in Africa. With these, Musafa can maintain a spiritual connection to his ancestry which elates Mother Wind.

Never Forgotten is therefore a story that helps young generations of Africans both at home and in the diaspora to understand their history and come to terms with it. It underscores the need for the Africans out of Africa to always maintain a spiritual connection to their roots by remembering their culture and priding in it as Musafa and the others do through the folktales and fables they tell, and also through the kind of food they eat.

The illustrations add more evidence to the spirituality that accompanies the African. The cover shows a picture of a father presenting his son to the moon probably calling on the elements of nature to guide and protect him along life. The other illustrations give an insight into the bond between Dinga, Musafa and the Mother Elements. The role of the father in the child's spiritual and cultural attachment to homeland cannot be overemphasized. Dinga decides to raise his son as a single parent, despite pleas of the elders to get him a surrogate mother, to lead him into the ways of the land. Though they end up being separated from each other, none forgets the other because of the filial bond that the father made strong. Therefore, the story is also one of fatherhood, reminiscent too of the fatherland, which never forgets its children.
