Additional information

Summary

Fables attributed to Aesop were collated in antiquity by Demetrius of Phaleron, c. 300 BCE (Diogenes Laertius, 5.80), and passed on through various retellings in antiquity and the medieval, early modern, and modern periods. This publication features retellings of many of the available Aesop's Fables, divided into categories based on themes: Pride, Trickery, Greed, Quarrels, Friendship, Cunning, and Retorts. This arrangement encourages the reader to be conscious of the messages within the stories, particularly their moral themes. Some of these classifications are a little more forced than others (The Town Mouse and the Country Mouse is not 'about' friendship in any meaningful sense, for example, rather than simply being a story that features friends), but they all essentially make sense. The titles included are:

Pride:

- The Fox and the Crow
- The Peacock and the Crane
- The Hare and the Tortoise
- The Eagle, the Jackdaw and the Shepherd
- The Fox and the Grapes
- King of the Birds

Trickery:

- The Wolf in Sheep's Clothing
- The Cat and the Hens
- The Lion and the Fox
- The Cat and the Mice
- The Wolf and the Heron

Greed:

- The Goose that Laid the Golden Eggs
- The Fox in the Tree
- The Dog and the Bone

Quarrels:

- The Sun and the Wind
- The Lion and the Statue
- The Fox and the Stork

- The Lion and the Wild Boar

Friendship:

- The Town Mouse and the Country Mouse
- The Ant and the Dove
- The Explorers and the Bear
- The Lion and the Mouse

Cunning:

- The Crow and the Jug
- The Fox and the Billy Goat
- Belling the Cat
- The Dog on the Roof

Retorts:

- The Piglet and the Sheep
- The Lioness and the Vixen
- The Fox and the Rooster
- The Fir Tree and the Bramble
- The Crab and its Mother

Comeuppance:

- The Tortoise and the Eagle
- The Ant and the Grasshopper
- The Boy who Cried Wolf
- Zeus and the Tortoise

About the stories.

The stories all conclude with an explicitly stated moral (captioned 'Moral'); this follows the medieval tradition of applying moral epilogues to the fables.

Analysis

Each story in this collection features a title illustration and one full page illustration; most contain further small illustrations, although there are some double-pages without any illustration. The illustrations situate the stories in a variety of locations and time-periods, although most appear to be set in Northern Europe, as indicated by the extensive use of rich green grassy environments and traditional Northern European architecture. Atypically, in The Lion and the Fox, reference to antelope, warthog, buffalo, zebra, and wildebeest place the story in Africa, while The Lion and the Wild Boar is also situated in Africa through the depiction of an elephant, giraffe, rhino, antelope, and a savannah landscape. This is a change from the ancient tradition, which would be referring to the European lion, with the story situated in southern Europe; the change makes the story more comprehensible to a modern readership living in an age in which the European lion is largely extinct and African lions more familiar. The emphasis on Northern Europe creates the impression that these stories originated in or are drawn from Northern Europe. This diminishes the sense of a specifically Greek origin, presumably targeting a Northern European market of readers who see their own environment reflected in the stories, rather than being transported by the stories to a different country. The inclusion of the African setting adds diversity and the implication that the stories have resonance beyond Europe, although this element is limited by its rarity.

Items such as electric lamps place some of the stories in the twenty to twenty-first centuries, while others depict figures in medieval or Victorian clothing. The main indication of antiquity comes from the figure of Zeus, who appears in two of the stories, King of the Birds and Zeus and the Tortoise. In both he is referred to as 'Zeus' (rather than e.g. Jupiter). He is depicted as an older white man with white hair and beard, and with accessories that indicate antiquity: laurel wreath, gold bracelets, and his symbol, the lightning bolt (p. 46). In both images he is dressed in white robes. The other indicator of antiquity in the book is a two-page About the stories at the end. This section is aimed at young readers (rather than their parents). It informs the reader that these stories are from 'long, long ago'. It explains that an ancient Greek called Aesop 'may' have written them, but that it was so long ago no-one knows. It asserts that 'fables' means stories with a moral lesson at the end; although that is not entirely accurate, it is a practical introductory definition which, like the sub-sections, invites the reader to consider the message of the story. Finally, readers are invited to try and invent a fable, as students of ancient Greece did.
