Summary

A collection of fables and tales from European philosophy, mythology, Eastern wisdom, popular tradition of many countries. All stories are similarly structured. Each fable is followed by an indication of source and then by a modern explanation of the moral entitled In the Philosopher's Workshop (Dans l'atelier du philosophe). The key-words for each story are placed on the upper margin. Words considered difficult for the child reader are explained in footnotes, e. g. *Parabole: petit récit sous lequel se cache un enseignement et parfois même une morale.

More on tales connected to classical antiquity:

Socrates told his students to weigh up what they want to say according to three principles: is it true, is it good, is it useful. If what we want to say is none of the three, we should simply forget it.

Three anecdotes about Diogenes, with the following morals:

Independence & freedom are more important than great wealth.

Simple pleasures of life are more desirable to the wise than riches.

To live without possessions is to be free.

Pliny the Younger tells the story of a former slave who made a great success of his small farm and was accused by envious neighbours of using magic. He brought his oxen and his farming tools to the court and said that this was the only magic he could show because he could not bring his sweat and effort invested in great quantities in his farm. The court acquitted him unanimously.

Aesop's fable about travellers criticizing a shade-giving tree as useless even though, they were able to rest in its shade, warns us not to judge an issue before we fully understand it.

Horace tells the story about the blade hanging over Damocles' head: how strong must be our desire for power if we're ready to live under constant threat of death.

Ovid in his Metamorphoses talks about King Midas trying to hide his donkey's ears given him as a punishment by Apollo but the truth always comes out. Ovid also relates the story of Narcissus who fell in love with his own reflection: love of oneself is necessary but if it becomes excessive, one may go mad.

Sophocles' tragedy Antigone tells us about the conflict between human and divine laws and reflects on the dilemma which one should we observe and when.

Plato's story of the ring of Gyges making the wearer invisible brings up the question, would we do good or bad, if we were not afraid of punishment for our actions?

Analysis

Mythological stories and ancient anecdotes are collected here along with similar fables and tales from other regions, providing a useful and light introduction to the philosophy of various cultures. The classical stories concern several Greek philosophers about whom the nine-yearold readers meet probably for the first time, such as Socrates, Diogenes, and Plato. They are presented in the context of well known anecdotal episodes in their lives which encourages further interest in their characters, their times, and their achievements. Children see these figures as characters living memorable adventures increasing their awareness of the remote. Antiquity, as fascinating and not entirely dissimilar from their own time. The other stories taken from Graeco-Roman culture present situations with a moral conclusion, most of them borrowed from well-known myths and described by Greek and Roman writers, poets and prose writers. Philo-Fables by offering also information about sources constitute a well designed, attractive and informative "first contact" with classical culture within the context of other world cultures.
