Donald Cotton , 1928 - 1999 (Screenwriter, Scriptwriter)

Donald Cotton (1928–1999) was an English writer for TV and radio, as well as for the stage. He specialised in classically-themed works, including a July 1951 musical Pandorus (focused on Troilus and Cressida) at London's Guildhall; and Echo and Narcissus (1959), The Golden Fleece (1962), and The Tragedy of Phaethon (1965) for BBC Radio. He wrote the humorous The Myth Makers storyline for Series 3 of Doctor Who (1965), as well as the Western-themed The Gunfighters (1965). Neither story was particularly well-received. Another Classically-themed script (The Herdsman of Aquarius was rejected for the 1966 series). Cotton worked on the BBC series Adam Adamant Lives! (1966–1967), and co-wrote the comedy album Medieval & Latter Days/An Englishman Abroad (1968). He novelised the Classically-themed Doctor Who adventures The Myth Makers (1985) and The Romans (1987).

Summary	'The Myth Makers' continued the early tendency of Doctor Who (1963-1989; 2005-present) to mix science-fiction adventures with historically-themed storylines (as an extension of its intended educational role). The story sees the crew of the TARDIS (the time/space machine) materialise in Bronze-Age Asia Minor, just outside the walls of Troy (at the very moment when Achilles slays the Trojan champion Hector; indeed causing the death of the Trojan prince). The Doctor (an alien 'Time Lord' from the Planet Gallifrey) is mistaken for Zeus, and he is led away to the Greek encampment, meeting King Agamemnon and Odysseus (who is suspicious of the Doctor's true identity). The other members of the TARDIS crew are captured (as is the TARDIS itself, with Vicki on-board, prefiguring the Trojan Horse incident). They then encounter the likes of Cyclops, King Priam, Cassandra, and Paris. The basic narrative of Homer's Iliad, Virgil's Aeneid, Shakespeare's Troilus & Cressida, and other accounts of the Trojan War, are played-out across the four episodes; all with a humorous angle, and with the science-fiction element that characterised Doctor Who. Writer Donald Cotton undertook meticulous research into the historicity or otherwise of the Trojan Wars, consulting the relevant volumes of the Cambridge Ancient History (1924-5); Nicholas Geoffrey Lemprière's A History of Greece to 322 BC (1959); M. I. Finley's The World of Odysseus (1956); Chester S. Starr's Origins of Greek Civilization (1962); Andre Bonnard's three-volume Greek Civilization (1954); Stanley Casson's The Discovery of Man: The Story of the Inquiry into Human Origins (1939); J. B. Bury's History of Greece to the Death of Alexander the Great (1922); Leonard Whibley's Companion to Greek Studies (1916); and Hilda Lorimer's Homer and the Monuments (1950). Having determined the unlikely historicity of the wooden horse, Cotton allowed his characters to intervene in this aspect of 'history': it is the Doctor who proposes the use of the wooden horse to Odysseus and Agamemnon (having mused to himself that 'the whole story is obviously absurd'). Drawing on Cotton's earlier fascinations, the Doctor's companion Vicki is renamed Cressida, and she remains on the Trojan plain at the end of the story (having fallen in love with Troilus); while the Trojan handmaiden Katarina joins the TARDIS crew as her replacement (subsequently encountering the Doctor's arch-enemies, the Daleks, in the next serial).

Analysis

'The Myth Makers' is a key example of mid-1960s educational television entertainment. Watched by over 8 million viewers during its broadcast, the serial is a key example of a science fiction intervention into the Classical world/ancient myth, and legend. The time travelling theme of the program was a handy device for justifying the incursion into Classical and ancient themes (historical and mythical). The Doctor and his companions serve as useful avatars for the young audience-members as they are introduced to and familiarised with the Classical/ancient history context of the storyline, or reacquainted with matters with which they were supposed to be familiar (such themes were still central to British elementary-level schooling in the 1960s).
