| Summary | Come A Stranger (1986) tells the story of Mina Smiths, who appears elsewhere in the Tillerman series as one of Dicey Tillerman's few friends. The novel starts a couple of years before Mina and Dicey meet, with Mina finding out she has been awarded a scholarship to a prestigious ballet summer camp. She loves her time at the camp, despite being the only black student, and returns to her home in Crisfield, Maryland, interested only in traditionally white cultural fields (classical music, ballet, British literature) and dismissive of black culture. On returning to camp the following summer, Mina's new physical maturity combined with her awareness of the racism around her prevent her from dancing well, and she is sent home early. On her way home, Mina meets Tamer Shipp, who appears in a previous Tillerman book as the friend of Dicey's uncle Bullet. Now a reverend |

like Mina's father, Tamer tells her the story of his friendship with Bullet, who was killed in the Vietnam War, while also helping her to accept and love herself and find joy in her community. Back at school, Mina meets and befriends Dicey, and engineers a meeting between Tamer and Bullet's mother (Dicey's grandmother). The novel ends with Mina meeting a boy her own age and considering a future as a lawyer.

Analysis

A core theme of this novel is the conflict Mina faces between Eurocentric, white-centric culture and her own. Despite her growing appreciation of classical music, dance and literature, Mina's attempts to join in are thwarted by the racism inherent in dominant cultural products and the way they are interpreted by others. For example, in a ballet based on C.S. Lewis's Narnia books, Mina is cast as a Tarkaan and the evil deity Tash, both part of the Calormene society. Lewis's depictions of the Calormenes draws heavily on stereotypes of the Middle East and has led to accusations of racism and Orientalism. Later in the novel, when playing tennis in an otherwise all-white class, Mina is called "Odile" (Swan Lake's black swan) by her opponent.

Classical motifs appear in the novel as sources of frustrations for Mina. Ancient Greek culture is at first presented as something different from the dominant culture: a peer at dance camp describes how "Isadora Duncan... broke away from classical ballet and went back to the ancient Greeks." (p. 20). Yet as the novel progresses, Mina comes to experience ancient Greek culture as something entwined with the dominant culture that undermines her ability to value black culture and herself: "Mom, didn't you ever think? There are all these myths about gods and goddesses, because the ancient Greeks believed in them, and the Romans, and all we ever had was Brer Rabbit. And the Ananse stories." (p. 47). Greek and Roman culture becomes synonymous with whiteness, reflecting not the historical reality of Greece and Rome, but the use and appropriation of classical culture by white supremacists as 'proof' of racial superiority.

Greek mythology is evoked in a similar way in the novel's recurring tree motif: "In Narnia, Mina would want to be a dryad... she [remembered] that dryads came from Greek mythology. They belonged to the white world... they had so much, they had everything, and they kept reminding her that it wasn't any of it hers." (p. 65). As with Isadora Duncan's 'ancient Greek' dancing, Mina's reception of antiquity and classical mythology is indirect, mediated and filtered through the dominant culture. Trees initially feature as symbols of Mina's comparisons of the external trappings of cultures and communities, her preference for the white-dominated ballet camp and her sense of being trapped in her own body. Later in the novel, trees shift from external to internal symbols of value, as Mina recovers from her experiences at ballet camp and appreciates the love and joy that surrounds her at home: "there was a quiet gladness, deep like a tree and tall in her (p. 114). Trees also reflect Mina's growing awareness of the history of racism, from the "dead stumps" of Louisiana swamps during the time of slavery (p. 105) to the 1930s anti-lynching song "Strange Fruit" (p. 220).
