Additional information

Summary

A large family with children is vacationing at the seashore. One of the boys manages with his younger brother and cousins to catch a sea-horse. The brother promises the sea-horse that he would set him free and in spite of being scared of his older brother, he does release the creature back to the sea. The brother is furious and turns all the other boys against him. They refuse to play with him. The boy, bored and unhappy, starts reading Jules Verne's Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea. During the night, a gigantic Hippocamp (sea horse) comes to take him to Nautilus and Captain Nemo who asks the boy what he would like to receive as gift for his courageous behaviour. The boy asks Nemo to teach him how to sing, as it is his great dream. Nemo sends him to the Mermaids who teach him the Sirens' Song and are beautiful and charming to him. After the music lesson, the Hippocamp takes him back to the family hut. When he wakes up the next morning, he begins to sing beautifully the Mermaids' song at the seashore. All his family, including his older brother are enchanted by his voice and the song and nobody is cross with him any longer. A novel interpretation of Mermaids as 'domesticated' creatures, beautiful women appreciating recognition of their beauty and their magical singing; willing to teach their song to "good" humans, i. e. those who respect nature. These mermaids' song enchants by its wonderful music and does not cause harm.

Analysis

A summer sea-shore vacation story–diary of a contemporary boy who has mysterious encounters with mythical creatures of the sea he knows from a secondary literary source, Jules Verne's Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea. The story has strong ecological overtones and glorifies values such as keeping promises and respecting nature, its creatures and forces. The author uses also the motif of rendering assistance to a magical animal in distress and the gift offered by the animal grateful for the rescue, cf. the story of the fisherman and the golden fish and of many fairy-tales where timely magical rewards are given for help provided by the main character.
