Additional information

Summary

In Rome under Augustus, an orphan named Lucius from a wealthy Roman family has been brought up by his grandfather, Marcus Caïus Victor*, the owner of prestigious jewellery workshops and an influential magistrate (Decurion). To the boy's utter amazement, he learns from his grandfather that he was originally a Gaul who fought for Vercingetorix at Alesia, was taken prisoner, and then sold as a slave to an important Roman merchant. On their trip to Rome, they were shipwrecked and Marcus saved his master's life. He was later freed and adopted by Quintus Caïus Victor, the grateful merchant, whose daughter Flavia Domitia – Lucius' grandmother – he eventually married. Now in his old age, Marcus wants to see his native Gaul again and to show the country to Lucius, as well as to visit his granddaughter who lives there and divide his fortune between her and Lucius. For many years, Marcus has been regularly sending his accountant Gallus to Bibracte, his native village, with gifts of money for his family there. Gallus told him that his brother Grobix, also an excellent jeweller, passed away as did his daughter but that a granddaughter was alive and well. Marcus and Lucius, accompanied by the accountant Gallus, left from the port of Ostia and travelled to Narbo Martius in Gaul.

The second part of the story – entitled Who Wants Marcus Caïus Dead? – begins when Marcus and Lucius arrive in Gaul and continue their travel by a riverboat towards Bibracte. During the trip, somebody tries first, unsuccessfully, to poison Marcus. When he dies one night, Lucius suspects that his grandfather was smothered with his own pillow. Lucius decides to reach Bibracte and cremate his grandfather in the village of his ancestors. The accountant insists on a rapid burial but Lucius disagrees and continues the journey to Bibracte. Contrary to Gallus' reports from his annual trips to Gaul, Marcus' brother, Grobix, is still alive and warmly receives Lucius. It comes out that Gallus never contacted Grobix and was pocketing the money for himself. He murdered Marcus because he had been afraid of being discovered and punished for his theft and lies. Grobix and Lucius outsmart Gallus who is accidentally killed by horses when he attempts to flee. Lucius begins to work in Grobix' workshops and is happy to find his Gallic family; he wonders whether he will ever go back to his native city of Rome.

* His Gallic name is Dividiac, a variation on the only attested name of a Druid of the Aedui, Divitiacus. Ceasar mentions him in his Commentarii de Bello Gallico 1, 3; 16; 31; 2, 5; 14; 6, 12; 7, 39 and Cicero writes about him in De divinatione 1, 41.

Analysis	The content of the book clearly qualifies it for inclusion in the database. A fictional adventure of an adolescent allows for presenting the historical reality of everyday life in the early 1st century A. D. The novel serves as an aid for teaching the ancient history of France – Gaul, as a Roman province. It describes the situation of Roman citizen versus non-citizens born in the provinces, travels from Rome to Gaul, and the way of life under Augustus in Rome and in Gaul. A short final section of the book (Á propos de…) provides brief factual information on Rome, the siege of Alesia, Roman Gaul, and the town of Bibracte with its Aedui inhabitants.
